NOTE ON THE LATE PRESIDENT OF THE SOCIETY,
WILLIAM MORRIS.

THREE years have passed since, on the eve of the opening of our Fifth Exhibition, on October 3rd, 1896, William Morris, our late president, died.

It seems fitting, therefore, in inaugurating the Sixth Exhibition of the Society, to offer a word to the memory of the great designer and craftsman, poet, and social reformer, who has been so potent an influence in the movement of revival in the handicrafts which has characterized the later years of our century.

Looking at the evidences of his extraordinary energy and power of concentration spent upon the details of so many different crafts, one is struck no less by the vigour and strength of his work in each as by the care and taste displayed.

William Morris's unerring instinct for decorative beauty in surface ornament allowed him to be exuberant and profuse, rich and intricate, or, as in the earlier work, frank and simple. One sees an English taste and reserve united with a luxuriant and almost Oriental fancy. Yet through them all one feels the spirit of the romantic and narrative poet refining and informing every detail, as one may see the sunlight illuminating the leafy meshes of a wild wood.

In the same way, as we wander through the poet's own garden in "The Earthly Paradise," we feel the spirit of the artist and craftsman dwelling lovingly upon the beauty of carved pillars and inlaid floors, the wonders of the loom, the vessels of brass, and of silver and gold, which become parts of that rich mosaic of romance which he himself wove in his verse and prose tales, so glowing with colour and pattern as scarcely to need the illuminator's gold and blue and scarlet—which again, in the literal sense, no one knew better how to use than William Morris.

Strictly reserved and formalized as his drawing and design were, in adaptation to printing and weaving, his treatment of natural forms shows the close observer and student of structural line and form, as well as the artist's delight in them.

An ardent enthusiast for the character and beauty of mediæval art, deeply penetrated with its spirit, while possessing a profound knowledge of its letter, he wrote and designed freely in what some thought the disguise of a past age, but it was as an artist not as an archæologist, and he was strengthened in all his work by his knowledge and love of architecture by which all the arts are united.

So that, although we may trace the sources of his inspiration and the various influences under which he lived, the total impression of the work of William Morris, regarded as a whole, is that of the full and free expression of a powerful personality,—and it was by the force of that personality that he was able to inspire and direct others with so much success, and to leave behind him a living tradition.

Again, in his social work, it was his passion for beauty, and love of a simple and wholesome life, however refined, which drove him to revolt against the gloomy conventions, the pretences, the meanness and shabbiness of so much in the aspects of modern existence.

Although with his usual thoroughness and power of concentration he pursued the matter to its roots in the economic system, his artistic instincts, as well as his reason and humanity, made him a Socialist; and, beyond the din of controversy, he took care to record his own conception of an ideal social state in his Utopian romance, "News from Nowhere."

The committee of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society, as organizers of the present exhibition, considered it only due to the memory of their late president to devote a room to a collection of his more intimate and personal work. (Of that of his life-long friend and colleague in art, Edward Burne-Jones, whose loss we have also to deplore, a monumental exhibition has already been given by the proprietors of The New Gallery.)

In the South Room, therefore, will be found a series of drawings and designs, particularly interesting as being the actual handiwork of William Morris, never having been exhibited before. These include the various coloured working drawings made for his wall-papers and textiles, some few figure designs and studies, fragmentary but full of character. Also the single oil picture he is known to have painted. Needlework and tapestry of his design, as well as some of his illuminated MS. work, and the original black-and-white drawings made for the Kelmscott Press, which crowned his artistic life and made him famous in yet another field.

Notes on the works, giving dates and other useful particulars, have been added to the catalogue by Miss May Morris, Mr. Sidney Cockerell (late secretary of the Kelmscott Press) and Mr. Dearle.

c. "Verses by William Morris." On paper, $11 \times 8\frac{1}{4}$ in. At end: "As to those who have had a hand in making this book, Edward Burne-Jones painted the picture on page 1: the other pictures were all painted by Charles F. Murray, but the minstrel figures on the title-page, and the figures of Spring, Summer and Autumn on page 40, he did from my drawings. As to the pattern-work, George Wardle drew in all the ornament on the first ten pages, and I coloured it; he also did all the coloured letters both big and little; the rest of the ornament I did, together with all the writing. Also I made all the verses, but two poems, the Ballad of Christine and the Son's Sorrow I translated out of Icelandic. William Morris, 26 Queen Sq., Bloomsbury, London. August 26th, 1870."

Lent by LADY BURNE-JONES.

d. "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyám." On vellum, $6 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$ in. At end: "I finished my work on this book on the sixteenth of October, 1872, W. Morris." Lent by LADY BURNE-JONES.

g—m. Books printed by WILLIAM MORRIS at the Kelmscott Press. The Kelmscott Press was founded at Hammersmith in January, 1891, and the first leaf printed there is shown in Case X. The first book, finished on April 4, 1891, was "The Story of the Glittering Plain," small 4to, in a Roman type. Designed by MORRIS, and named the "Golden" from "The Golden Legend," which was also printed with it. A black-letter type was designed later in the same year and first used for "The Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye," finished Oct. 14, 1892. This was named the "Troy" type. A smaller type of the same design was cut in 1892 and first used in the list of chapters and glossary of the same book. This was called the "Chaucer" type, having been primarily intended for the folio edition of Chaucer's works, begun in Aug., 1894, and finished May 8, 1896. MORRIS designed a great quantity of initials, borders, and other ornaments, which were engraved upon wood, and the blocks of which are now at the British Museum. The Press continued for seven years, and in that time fifty-two works, in sixty-six volumes, were issued from it. It was closed in March, 1897, and the type reserved for the exclusive use of the trustees. All the Kelmscott Press books here shown are lent by EMERY WALKER.
